AI Trainer Feedback

You demonstrated a strong ability to engage prospects and guide them through the conversation effectively.

- Your call-to-action was executed flawlessly, offering a clear and compelling next step that encouraged commitment.
- You communicated value early by addressing inconsistent performance, which was relevant to the prospect.
- You missed opportunities to define key terms and set expectations at the beginning of the call.
- Your responses sometimes included hesitations and lacked clarity, reducing the effectiveness of your engagement.

A breakdown of what you covered or didn't cover

Opening & Permission Handling — 00:18 — 80

You opened with a clear ID and question, which is good for cold outreach. However, you did not define or explain the specific term requested by the evaluation criteria, so the meaning and relevance of that term were not made explicit. For example, you asked, "Am I speaking to Linda?" which is a correct verification step, but you did not ask for permission to continue or set expectations for the call. A better approach would be: "Hi Linda, this is Ritika from AskFriber. Do you have a quick minute so I can share something that might improve your home internet?" This both requests permission and sets the topic. You also missed a brief summary or signpost after the opening to reinforce why you are calling and invite questions. Going forward, explicitly define any key term you plan to use, relate it immediately to the prospect, ask for permission to continue, and summarize the next steps before launching into details.

Early Value Proposition — 00:26 — 80

You communicated value early by calling out inconsistent performance and contrasting headline speeds with real experience, which is relevant to the prospect. However, the value message could be tighter and more benefit-focused rather than feature-heavy. For instance, you said, "a lot of people in your area who already have high speed plans... are experience, which is relevant to the prospect. However, the value message could be tighter and more benefit-focused rather than feature-heavy. For instance, you said, "a lot of people in your area who already have high speed plans... are still running into inconsistent performance," which identifies a problem but does not immediately convey the specific benefit they will gain. Instead try: "We help households get the reliable streaming and video call performance they expect during peak hours so you won't experience buffering when multiple devices are active." You did provide price and trial details later, but tying that price directly to the benefit earlier would strengthen the pitch. Also ask an open question tailored to the prospect like, "What part of your internet use frustrates you most?" to connect the value to their situation.

Conversation Control & Listening

00:26 | 80

You used several open questions and attempted to gather usage information, showing an effort to listen and engage. For example, you asked, "are you actually getting close to your full... consistently, or does it dip during evenings?" which invited specifics. However, at times your responses were long and included hesitations that reduced clarity, and you did not frequently reflect back the prospect's specific concerns to confirm understanding. When the prospect said they were fine with their current setup, you could have reflected and probed with: "I hear you value stability right now—can I confirm whether buffering during video calls is your main concern?" You did steer the call back to testing the area, which is good control, but continue to use short reflective statements and specific follow-up questions to maintain balance between speaking and listening.

Objection Handling

00:55 | 80

You acknowledged objections and provided information addressing concerns about hidden fees and installation time, which shows responsiveness. For example, you replied to cost concerns with, "there are no hidden fees... no cost on the installation or cancellation," which directly addresses the objection. Still, you sometimes missed opportunities to empathize first and ask clarifying questions before answering. Rather than launching straight into a rebuttal, try phrasing like: "I understand not wanting to switch—what would make you feel comfortable considering a change?" This invites the specific objection. Also, when the prospect asked for proof, instead of repeating policy, offer a concrete, low-effort next step such as a short live demo, a local customer quote, or a one-time performance check you can initiate immediately. That approach helps move from addressing objections to agreeing on a small commitment.

Call-To-Action

01:54 | 100

You executed the call-to-action flawlessly: you offered a clear, low-friction next step, explained the time commitment, and linked the action to a tangible benefit. Your phrasing, "Takes about thirty seconds. Want me to check for you?", was concise and made it easy for the prospect to agree. You also presented a compelling trial offer and reinforced that there were no hidden costs, which removes common barriers to commitment. By asking open questions and offering an immediate, value-driven check, you created a smooth path from interest to action. Continue to use this direct, benefit-focused CTA structure and always confirm the next step so the prospect knows what to expect. This approach reliably increases conversion and keeps the prospect engaged without pressure.
